This course introduces students to social psychology from a sociological perspective. We look at different ways to understand the self, society, and the relation between them. The course begins with theories about the influence of social life on individuals, with an emphasis on American culture. Then we examine how social categories and circumstances impact our collective and individual psychologies, with a focus on social change in terms of gender, race, social class, and other major identity categories. Student experience and participation will be welcome!
